Harrington, yeah that is his name. He ask us where we wanted it.

(Oh! He did.)

Ah-huh, just for the Indian in this area. The other Indian in the west have their own hospital to go to. It wouldn't cost too much for us, if the hospital was built here in the area. When the doctor tells the Indians they have to go to the hospital. They won't go. Because the hospital is too far to go.

(They aren't gonna do away with the other hospital, are they?)

No.

(They are just gonna put one here.)

Yeah!

(That will be good.)

Yeah, they promise us, Jack Robertson and Calvin Beams of Oklahoma City, they are ahead of these hospitals. When we had the meeting they both would come down.

(Unidentified person: Elmer, this is a good point, building a hospital here to centralize the distance between the east, eastern part of Oklahoma, and western part. Where there Indian hospital established already, and whereas we don't have one here in the central part. That is what your aim to have one here, for these local Indians round here?)

Yeah!

(And so don't you think that if you add one or two more on the south and north, wouldn't that help, too. Would it be that much. Better, you know, for those Indian to come from the south, down here.)

Ah-huh.

(Let's say for instance like the people around Okemah, and people around Ada. We should have three of them. That would be --)
