

warriors to defend the camp. Still another story quotes Sitting Bull himself, while in Canada, as saying that he directed the women and children as to where to go when the camp was attacked and guided them to a place of safety. There seems to be no doubt that the women and children did run when Reno struck the camp. I have heard that it was the duty of a medicine man to look out for women and children generally. What do you think of these stories? Where was Sitting Bull and what was he doing? If he was a coward and ran away as some people claim, how did it happen that great Warriors like Gall and Crazy Horse followed him, after the fight, as they certainly did for some time? And why did so many Indians stick to him through thick and thin?

Who were Sitting Bull's right-hand men, anyway? Who were the men who were killed trying to save him from the policeman in 1890? I have heard that Spotted Eagle was one. Is this correct?

Your story about White Cow Walking is interesting. I hope the old woman's ghost soon finds repose so that the old man can talk more freely. It must be very unpleasant to have a ghost following you around the way she does.

Yours truly,
