Otis sent a fim rely by a scout and proceded with the train surrounded by the Indians, who, for a considerably time, kept up firing but gradually fell to the rear. When General Miles learned the situation from Colonel Otis he started after SB and over took him near the head of Geddr Creek, a northern affluent of the Yellowstone. SB sent a flad of truce to General Miles desiring to communicate, and Gen. Miles met him with Chief Gall and several tothers between the lines. SB shrewdly wished for an & "old-fash ioned peace" for the winter (when warfare ismost difficult), with permission to hunt and trade forammunition, on which conditions he agreed not to molest the troops. But General Miles is object was permanent peace and the security of the territory then and before dominated by the Sioux, and he told SB plainly that peace could come only by absolute submission. When the interview closed the troops were more with the intention of intercepting the Indians should they try to move northward, and on the 21st of October another similar interview between the lines occurred

The Indians indoubtedly intended to emulate the act of bad faith by which General Camby lost this life at the hands of the Modocs, April 11,1873, Several of their younger warriors, with affectedcarelesness, gradually moved forward in postion to surround the party under the flagof truce. General Miles, observing this, moved back a step or two and told SB very forcibly that those men were too young for the council, and that the "talk" would end just there unless they turned to their lines. One of them had slipped a carbine up under his buffalo robe, Another muttered to SB',2"Why don't you talk strong?" and he replied, "When I say that, I am going to shoot him." Meantime the troops were held in readiness to attack, had any act pf bad faith wheen attempted; even the accidental discharge of a firearm would have precipitated xx an attack in which all between the lines would have fallen. It became evelent, at last, that only force could settle the quiestion, and General Miles said to SB, "Iwill either drive you out of this country or you will me. I willtake no advantage of you under flag of truce and give you fiteen minutes to get back to your lines then, if my terms are not accepted, I will open fire." Withan angry grunt the old Medic ine Man turned and ran back to his lines; the whole country was alive with Indians, not less than a thousand warrors swarmed all about the command, which in a slender line extended to protect front and flanks and rear, pushed vigorously forward and prove the Indians from the deep valleys at the source of Cedar Creek, compelling them to leave some of their dead on the battle field which they never wilingly do, and then pursued them so hotly for forty-two MANA miles to the Yellowstone tha they ahandoned food, lodge poles, camp ag equipage and ponies.

One October 27, more than four chundred lodges, about two thousand Indian surrendered to General Miles, and five chiefs were taken as hostages for the execution by the Indians of their terms of surrender, i.e. to go to their varbus agencies, SB and his family immediate following, his family and connections by marriage, broke away from the main bodyduring the pursuit and escaped northward, where he was later joined by Gall and other chiefs with some

The estimated number of warriors in this engagement was one thousand. To General Miles and to the 5th Infantry, three knames hundred and ninety-eight
