THE WILD WEST

Buffalo Bill's Exhibition at the Woodbine.

A REALISTIC REPRESENTATION

Of Life Among the Indians of the Plains.

A Visit to the Camp

Sitting Bull Tells About His Aims and His Deeds.

Buffalo Bill's Wild West Exhibition arrived in the city early on Saturday morning from Belleville. The train consisted of eighteen cars. The Company comprises about 150 cowboys, Mexicans, and Indians. They have 80 horses, a large herd of buffalo, a couple of elk, and a number of other interesting animals which are to be found on the plains. At eight o'clock the tents and Indian lodges had been pitched in the Woodbine Driving Park, east of the Don. The street parade, which took place in the forenoon was a novel one. Headed by the cowboys' band, which is one worth hearing, a long procession of Indians, scouts and cowboys followed on horseback. Hon. W. F. Cody ("Buffalo Bill"), whose exploits during the great Sitting Bull war in 1876 are known to every reader of the newspapers, was prominent in the procession. His fine appearance on horseback and handsome features were admired by the vast crowds who lined the streets to witness this interesting parade. Buffalo Bill is a man apparently forty years of age, and he stands over six feet high. Another interesting feature of the procession was the famous old Deadwood coach, which has been baptised many and many a time with fire and blood. According to the reports this old vehicle, drawn by six mules, was the scene of the death of a large number of adventurers who sought the Black Hills during the gold fever of 1875 and 1876. On horseback were the members of Sitting Bull's staff, who are prominent among the red men of the West. The procession reached
