re-enforcements with two pieces of artillery arrived, when the Indians yielded and accompanied the troops to Fort Robinson, where all arms which could be found remaining were taken from them, and the prisoners were confined in an empty set of barracks. The remainder of the fugitives, under "Little Wolf," succeeded in making their escape by scattering among the Sand Hills, where a dense snow covered their trail, though troops kept up the search until numbers of the soldiers were badly frozen.

On October 5, the commanding officer at Fort Clark, Tex., reported that one boy and three girls, belonging to a family named Dowdy, were killed by Indians at a ranch on Johnson's Fork of the Guadaloupe, Texas.

October 22, Maj. G. Ilges, Seventh infantry, with a detachment of troops from Fort Benton, Mont., captured a camp of thirty-five half-breed Indians, with eighty horses and fourteen guns, trespassers in Montana from the British possessions. The same day John Sanders, a stage driver, was killed near Flat Rocks, Tex. (Reported by the commanding officer of Fort Stockton, Tex.)

November 27, the commanding officer of Fort Ellis, Mont., reported that "Ten Doy," a friendly Indian, had arrested seven hostile Bannocks, disarmed them, and sent them under an Indian guard to Colonel Miles, at Tongue River.
