

The interesting fact is that both the Germans and the Sioux use the concept "red" as expressing "incomprehensibility" why? I have never been able to explain it. The Sioux call the Cheyennes "Sáieia", lit.: "it sounds red" i. e. incomprehensible.

"Iásića", Pron. : ee-áh-shee-chah is the Sioux name for the Germans.

Etymology: iá = to speak; síća = badly;

due to the observation that the German immigrants could not speak English very well. It almost seems that the Indians got the impression that the Germans could not speak well at all (in any language!).

This is probably the name for all later comers who spoke neither French nor English. They hardly distinguished between Germans, Skandinavians, Dutch etc.

Today the word "wasícun" is used for all white men.
