

mouth and they kinda, the lady, she walked around me three times and of course she said something under her breath as she put this water in her mouth. And they don't really spit it on you, they kinda blow it on you. I just felt like a fine spray of water. You know, I'd had a real bad head ache for about two or three days and had a fever. I think it was some type of flu I had or something. My head ache was gone in about two hours.)

I should go to you. I get headaches every day.

(She walked around me three times. She couldn't tell me what she said but she just told me, "It's medicine.")

Dad tells me that my grandmother, you know, was an Indian doctor. And she tried to teach him he just never did pay much attention to it. So he doesn't know, he knows a little but you know not enough to do anything.

(Well this lady, she's not well known or anything but she just doctors her own family and everything. But she told me --- they sorta took up with me, they're kinda fond of me and she told me when I get a little bit older that she teach me all that she knows because you're not supposed to practice medicine until you're about forty or fifty.)

Oh.

(So she said I shouldn't really learn too much for a couple more years, or two, three, four years yet.)

I've got a cousin that does that and there's always a lot of people at his house. Did you know that Indian doctors say that they're not supposed to be paid, you know with money, just anything that somebody gives them. They're supposed to take.

(Probably rather it would be something personal, or something or just anything.)

Yeah or just anything.
