

of the charter members left, and it looks like it is going to be carried on for a few more years anyway. But there will be a lot of people that have sons who have served in the Armed Forces. And in your present class of your organization is more or less the same basic ones you had when you first started?)

Yes, that's right.

(You do about the same things you did when you first organized. Of course, times have changed a little and the younger people come along and join. I don't say they join your organization, what do you do? Invite them to join?)

Why, yes, we ask them, invite them.

(More or less by invitation.)

We're supposed to, you know. Have a membership drive on and invite members in. We don't just make them. We just invite them and we'd like for them to come and see what we are doing, and if they like it, why, they could join us and if they don't, why, that is always all right.

(Well, just like everything else, not everything else but I mean it seems like the younger people, they don't seem like they care to participate with you all.)

No, they don't. We often can't understand why. If it's the work they are afraid of or getting in and getting busy, I don't know what part they hesitate to come in and join the American War Mothers, which we think that is one of the greatest organizations going, especially national organization.

(Well, too, don't you sometimes try to tribute some of that to the young Indian ladies that are so involved, more or less, have moved out of Hominy and everything?)

Hun.

(Moved away from Hominy, some of them. I mean, it is like--of course, there
