

"Well, I'll fix my tobacco and you can smoke with me." So he went to work and rolled it and light it smoked it and pass it around. They all said it's tobacco, but they all seen what it was before it become tobacco. Then one day, when I was a little girl, I saw him did something too. But it's hard to believe those things, but white men have always do something--pull something out of a hat--that rabbit, bunch of ribbons or something like that, but he was pretty good I think. He made some, oh trash he made it, but he had a contest before with a Cheyenne man, but this time he was makin' it for a, two, three, four children to see what he did--made, got a branch of weed and put it on and he made his medicine and took it away and he said, "Children watch," he said, "Here's what I invite you for. This is your treat." Oh, that tree--that little tree was more than I expected and it had lot of plums on it. Everybody had a few off of that tree. And everybody liked to ask him to do it many times, but I guess he don't want to do it more than one times for a long time. Well, it was a wonderful thing that I saw for medicine man and today no Indians got no medicine like that. And I wouldn't believe anybody if they say they have. That this old man--my father told me that he was visiting them when somebody come running to them, they said, "This baby got choked, it's dying." And he just smoked slowly while they were anxious and wanted him to act right away and do something, but he sat there and said, "Bring the baby over here." And then the baby was just going--he couldn't hardly breathe because the thing was in it's throat choking it, wouldn't go down, it wouldn't come up. So, this old man carried it and said, "What's the matter baby?" And when they told him it was choking, it was gaping because it was trying to get its breath. So, after while the old man said, "O. K. , we'll have it fixed." And after while he'd talk to that baby and then he'd talk awhile, he says, something like a preacher, he said, "You made us," he said, "This little baby is choking," he says, "Fix it for us." And so he'd hit it back here--
