

ashes. Which will very effectively keep the coals alive until next morning. Then the next morning all you have to do is lay some small or fine kindling on it. Maybe part of the bark from trees. The part of the bark that lies next to the tree. And you can, it makes real good fire starters. You just crumble it up in your hand and just sprinkle it on the coal after you rake the ashes off and blow on it. Why you got you a fire going. And which is what happened here when Afraid of Water who had shaken the Kiowa's hand probably about a year previously, went to bed one night, not expecting any kind of fire in his camp until he got up in the morning. Sometime during the night a fire blazing in his tent woke him up which one of the requirements of survival at that time. To be a very light sleeper. When he awoke and saw that his camp fire was lite up. And then, of course, he realized that there was somebody sitting by his camp fire. And his camp fire was burning. What shouldn't be burning until early next morning. And then he recognized this Kiowa whose hand he had shaken probably over a year before. He was E-Sah Hah-be the Kiowa, Wolf Laying Down. And then he remembered, or he knew why the Kiowa had come. They had shaken hands and I believe made an agreement more or less to meet again the following year. And the Kiowa had come trying to find out why the Comanches had not arrived to make their peace. Make the peace between the two tribes. And after they visited a while it was seen that the Kiowa had brought along somebody that understood Comanche. Could have been a Shoshone. But somebody was with a Kiowa that could understand. That was how the Kiowa communicated with them. With the Comanches. And I got a little ahead there. The Comanches did not know this other person with this Kiowa could understand Comanche. Which is why the Kiowa had brought this other one along. But he had instructed him, "Do not let the Comanches know you could understand them." "When they're talking with me, when they talking to me cause
