

I know that they do.

"I wish I could come to that camp meeting, you know, sometime, because I think that would be real interesting to attend."

Yes, I never have been to one. I am going to try to go this summer.

"Do people camp in tents or anything?"

Yes, they have tents.

"They do."

They don't have any. . . well, they have houses out there but it's for people that are camping which they have to feed the people so that's only. . .

Every church has their own building. People that come in there have to bring their own tent. So they all camp out on the church ground. Wherever place they can find to put a tent, you know. Just like I said I never have been to these, any of these three big churches they have every year. But they say there's a lot of white people come to it.

"I was going to ask you another question about this family life, too. Do most of the Choctaws, when they're young live with their parents? Would they be raised by their own parents or would they, maybe, spend part of the time with grandparents or some other relative?"

Well, the children live with their parents and unless you have a broken home.

"Yes."

Then they got to live anywhere they can. Well, in cases like that, they try usually to get a place in a boarding school. But some children live with their grandparents when they get a little older. And they go back and forth, but, I think the biggest part of them live with their parents.

"Is there pretty strong feelings between grandparents and their grandchildren?"

Well, that I don't believe there is. Really there's not too many grandparents, most of them are gone so. . . just like us, both of my parents are dead. So Indian children and Choctaw they don't go and stay with anybody unless they have family trouble. They're just like anybody else.

"Yes, I was comparing it to western Oklahoma where sometimes the children sort
