

It sure does. The way I feel about it, I think it's just a waste of money. You know those medicines (not clear) and they take these medicines home and set it up in a cabinet somewhere and forget about it. And then they come back in a worser shape then they were when they left here. Well, have you been taking medicine and they'll tell you they haven't.

"I'm sort of in a way. . . you may hear some of this back tonight on the same subject but this morning I was talking about the Indian family and then also what we were talking about last night, you know, that's building up a good relationship between the nurse and the patient and then I was talking a little bit on health, Indian ideas on health and disease but see, I really don't know how this applies to the Choctaw today. You know back probably a hundred years ago things were different, but I'm interested to hear that there are still a few Indian doctors around."

Yes, it's not like it used to be. He's the only one I know, the fellow over at Boswell and another one lives over at Smithsville or Bethel somewhere. But we get him in now and then, you see.

"Oh, you do?"

Well, we were talking about that last night, you know. You know this panel we had, you know, and I was telling them. I said, well, I think that guy's been coming in and taking that medicine over there and mixing it up and passes it out to the other people, but I don't know. But that's the only two I know of. Maybe there's others. I don't know, I couldn't say.

"I want to be sure to ask you what I had in mind. How do you think the Indian people around here react to this hospital? Do you think that they come when they need to or hold back for some reason. This is just for my personal information."

Well, we will take one family that I know that lives right here in town. They are out there everyday. Well, doctors have sent those people to specialists and everything came back negative. But still they go out there and doctor examine them, you know, and five days a week, you know, I don't know. They still been