

(Might be hard to tell, wouldn't it. What you were looking for.)

FLUID FROM GRAPE VINES USED ON HAIR AND SCALP

Yeah. I thought about something, but I just can't--. You know, the sap on the grape vines, you know, sometimes the sap comes out of grape vines.

(Uh-huh.)

Well, when I was a little girl they used that on their hair. More like a shampoo like. They massaged that into their hair and everything. And they claim that your hair wouldn't be so easy to fall out.

(Really!)

FLUID FROM BABY LOCUSTS USED TO DELAY GRAY FROM HAIR

And there's something else, too, that they use. And that's well, locusts aren't common around here, now. But once in a while. But, you know, you can get a bunch of locusts and put them in a can while they just, I guess, call them larvae, you know, just young.

(Uh-huh.)

They put them in there. And then as they grow. It don't take a day for a locust to grow, you know. When the sun's up, it's already full grown.

(Oh.)

It's before the sun that you find those baby locust. And get them and put them in a can or jar or something. And as they grow, they give off some kind of saliva, I guess you call it. Some kind of water thing, you know, fluid. They give off this fluid and, you know, you can massage that into your hair. Into your scalp. And it, you won't get gray-headed young. And that seems to be. I don't know, maybe, just coincidence, just seems like it works because I've known several of them's that done that and they way up age. And they still got black hair. And it don't use dye. It's cheaper. /Laughter/

(Locust pomemade. /Laughter/)