

the people. That's one thing that Indians really have but lack. In other words, they have the unity but they don't go about it.

(But yet, you think job relocation is a good thing?)

I think job relocation is a good thing because it gives you more responsibility. As for instance, maybe a young guy going out of town. He's run around all his life. Drinking, just doing everything that he wants to do without even having any kind of means of support or any kind of responsibility. And once he leaves town, he has this responsibility. This fact that he has to support himself. Well, then he realizes how much of importance it is. Maybe some of the Indian youths don't think that way. I don't know. I have friends who went on relocation twice and then they come back 'cause they don't like to work. But see this is something always can't--

(Now is it that they don't like to work, or is it that they did not like the city and they felt ill at ease?)

Now this is what I don't know. Maybe they didn't have this full responsibility that they should have had. Maybe they wanted to come back home and live off their parents or off the welfare rolls instead of supporting themselves and having--living in a pretty good culture.

(Do you believe that the white--that the Indian should try his very best, to acculturate himself into the white mainstream?)

Well, I don't think he should try to come to the white man's ways.

Maybe if he can--

(I mean do you think that's the best way?)

Maybe--maybe if he can do better among his Indian counterparts. If he went to an Indian boarding school and had to apply for a job there. Or an Indian institution and apply for a job there. Well, maybe he can do better there. But I think he can find more responsibility among the
