

seven Cherokees to the court of King George, in 1730. Two of these were chiefs and others were just principal men of the tribe. On this next slide here lets' see how these were dressed (words irrelevant)

This is the dress of the Cherokee. It was rather interesting. While they were in England, they were lavishly entertained at King Goerge's Palace, at White Hall, and they enjoyed by Prince of Wales and numerous others. A London Newspaper, the Daily reported the Cherokee's audience with His Majesty went off splendidly with several of the so called savages from America with very good dealing with Alexander at the proper time. And Sir Alexander laid the crown of the Cherokee Nation at His Majesty's foot, and five eagle tails as an emblem of His Majesty's sovereignty and four scalps of Indian enemies, all of which His Majesty was pleased to accept. They made a very picturesque group. Some of them were dressed in, completely in British costumes and others were naked except for a breech cloth and for war paint. These returned to Cherokee area in 1731. Incidentally, there's an interesting story about this reading book some place. The Cherokee were inclined to call people liars. If they didn't believe what you said, and so on, they just say, "You lie." It's just simple as that. This is not the language of diplomacy so there was quite some time spent with these Cherokees before they met King George and before they went into the British Court to try to teach them some of the niceties of diplomatic language so that they wouldn't tell King George that he's a liar. Quite interesting. They finally did get it over, apparently because there were no incidents recorded. This treaty with England.

Incidentally, AlaKulaKula, a little carpenter, is over on the right. A little fellow on the right. There are number of interpretations of his name. All his life time, he favored the English. This treaty marked
