

crying. They said, "That bird will return and get the second cub."

They all feared this very large Ka-la-nu'. He was a fierce bird, and later on, he ate human beings when the human beings came to live upon the earth. But at this time, there were only talking animals.

It was much longer ago when this happened, when man came, when this bird was eating the animals, the bear, the wolf, and the deer--that used to happen. When the animals came the second time to the Turtle, they asked if he had finished his bow. He said, "Yes, I have finished, but I shall have to string the bow." He was working upon a skin, cutting it for a string. "When I get enough, I'm going to wind it at the end."

The animals were very restless, and they looked up in the sky, and they saw the bird still carrying the cub. "Maybe, he's finished now.

Let's see." They all went over to the Turtle again. "I'm putting my string on now," he said. "Well, now, he's nearly through. He's nearly finished with the bow," they said as they all gathered about.

Now, again, they said, "Go and see if he's finished now." "Are you finished?" they asked. "I still need to cut my arrow," he said. Then, they waited again. They were very restless. They moved about all the time while they were watching this bird carrying the cub. Then, they said, "Let's go see if he's finished now." They all went to see him again. They asked, "Are you finished this time?" "Yes, I'm finished now, but there is this little bit which you will have to help me.

When you help me, I want you to place my foot upon the bow. And when I get hold of the bow, then, you must make my arrow straight. You must point my arrow directly at the bird. When I pull the bow and shoot it, the arrow will fly straight to the bird, and the bird will fall."
