

(The first of several minutes of this side of tape is blank. First remarks by Mrs. Kilpatrick are irrelevant.)

Mrs. Kilpatrick: Now, you have heard the story of corn. Do you have any questions, stories, or about anything that we have talked about?

Unidentified voice: How do take verbatim what they said or told a story to you? How did you do that?

Mrs. Kilpatrick: Well, we had a tape recorder with batteries, and we taped everything we could use. Then, we took the tapes back to Dallas, Texas. That's where we sit down and translate it.

Unidentified voice: You seem to have such a catchy title. How did you choose it?

Mrs. Kilpatrick: We have some stories about thunder. That's the reason for the title. Maybe, I should--you a story about thunder. There are several versions of that also.

Mr. Hagerstrand: We can't hear the questions back here.

Mrs. Kilpatrick: Alright, you will all speak louder so Mr. Hagerstrand can hear. (Laughter) Are there any more questions about anything else?

This story: "We'll talk about the Thunder, Lightning, and the Eagle.

They say that Thunder and Eagle are fast friends. Long ago, Thunder spoke to every wild creature, everything that flew or everything with four legs. To the Eagle he said, "I appoint you the ruler. You must have a meeting with all the wild creatures, and you must answer all their requests. If you think the creatures should be a certain way, you make them that way. You ask them what they want to be," said the Thunder.

The Eagle called the meeting. All kinds of birds came to it. When they arrived, the meeting was called to order. The Eagle asked each one of them what he wanted to be able to do. The Quail, who was very selfish