

know the history of either group and where they come from, statements that might have come down about the migration to this country, to this section of the country?)

Well, all I know is, down in your eastern part, your Creeks, down in that area is dying out. The Macon, Georgia, Alabama, Georgia, Alabama, well, Tennessee, I guess, your adjoining states of Georgia, well, Georgia more likely, your main state of your Creek tribes. And your Florida state, your Seminole tribe. Now that was pretty close to each other. In times I think that way before that, that there was just only one tribe at the time. All this separation now, I don't know. I've never really dug down into the depths of history to see whether it really was. But rumors and tales say there was a separation of one tribe and the Seminole tribe as now, has strayed from the Creek tribe, and into one tribe went into the southeastern part of the Creeks and that was more or less in the everglades, the Florida state. So I found it, that it, I can't say it is two different tribes. As of now you look at it, it is because it has been written. But looking at it that way from the elders telling you that it's still one tribe. And the Georgia and the Florida over to the Creeks and Seminoles of one tribe. Just one group strayed away from the other group that's all. That's just the way I believe from listening to the Indians. Might be written, might not be written but that's the way I look at it. But it's interesting.

(What would be the story of the creation of the tribe? Do you have any stories about this?)

Well, one time these people lived below the surface of this ground. They had to be pretty small, small group of people. They set and talked quite awhile. And was telling me, below the surface of this people, a group of
