

them in bread pans and put them in, put them over a, over a fire and they get, put a little grease on it. They make out. But one day when you're down this way, I'll have mother make up some and let you eat all those things.

(Good, I'd like to. Do you have any breads that are cooked in hot grease?)

Yeah, fry bread, and flat bread and cowboy bread, whatever you want to call it.

(Is it all the same, just different names?)

Yeah, down at Anadarko, I was down there one year. They, there's an Indian boy that invited me down there one time. They have nothing but fry bread feast. And all it is, it's just regular biscuits fried in hot grease you know. But I mean they have salads and stuff like that if you want to eat things there. But it's just kind of fry bread big dinner. It's just like the Kolache (?) Festival at Prague, Oklahoma. You know it's just like that. Just little old pastries you call them, why it's just like that over at Prague. I mean over at Anadarko as it is anywhere's else. But that's there way of life. It's their respecting the fry bread. And same way over at the Czechs'. Czechoslovakians over there, it's Czech's now and they have Kolache (?) Festival.

(What is the fry bread as such, is a meal or is a, in your case?).

To us, it's a regular every day eating.

(Well, do you make it with flour or...?)

Yeah, you make it with flour and, flour, baking powder and salt. Then fry it. Taste pretty good. I mean...

(You don't have any deep fried with the corn meal, though?)

No, they just come out real crispy, about that big and you just like eating, oh, lets say, Hi-Ho crackers, or rich crackers or something like
