

A CEMETERY - CHURCH - SCHOOL

(Yeah. Yeah there was something about that particular place where some notable characters and people used to come and they visited and conducted some kind of business there. I don't remember what it was now. Then they finally established a cemetery there somewhere in that country.)

Yeah, mother she was raised there. It was kind of an out-of-way place there. And I think they finally got it fenced in. It's not cleaned off or anything like that. Little better taken care of than it used to be.

(Well it must be an old place then.)

Yeah it is. Indians by the name of Woodard lived on it. They had a whole -- they had a whole bunch of them. I don't know. I guess they was five or six, seven of them children. And it wasn't any of them ever married.

(Well, my goodness.)

The last one just died a few years -- oh, it was probably eight, ten years ago. That was the last one of the family. And they all lived in there,

(Uh-huh. No, if someone was still living that had seen that place down there and could tell us what it looked like and the people that were around there at that time. Which reminds me too, was there ever an old school established down in there at one time, or a church?)

No. I guess, Buckhorns 'been about the oldest church down around in there that I know of.

(Which way was it from McLain?)

East. Due east. Two miles east of there. And there's been a church in there ever, since I can remember. Nearly ever one that I've talked to around there.

(Was it a school too, at one time? Also a school.)

Yeah they had a school there once. It was well, you know one of those Christian schools where you paid.

(Oh, yes a Christian school.)
