

MISSION BUILDINGS MADE OF STONE AND HOMEMADE BRICK

Well, now when we moved here there were about eight, where they had made-- now, there second building was made of stone. But there was quite a lot of rocks down in this hill and you can still see the humps where they were, you know and some of the old rocks left there.

(Um-hum.)

And you know the store back here, back of us, back of this corner, don't you?

(Yes.)

Well, there's a house right back out there and the old fireplace was made of the rocks from out here.

(Now was the Mission on this side of the county road or on the other?)

Just on the other side, it was just over this railroad. Drive over up to it. Drive on the railroad here you know, and come up that way a little and you can see it from where the road is.

(It was all back up in there, hum.)

Um-hum, and the school house--see, they made it out of brick. Now, it don't state that in this last magazine I got. But that's right I know it is made of bricks. They might have had a little old wooden one at first but they made those brick down here on the river. Did you ever know Luther Pruitt?

(I knew of him.)

Well, he lived off down in there and I've been to the place where he got the clay off down here.

(Well!)

And they made those bricks themselves. And there is some bricks still lying there where you can see them. And, uh---

(They got that at the old site, hum?)
