

(At this part he talks about the fish again. I told that on first part.)

I think it's all right about buying license. There wouldn't be no money to take care of quails if we didn't have to buy license. Indians didn't waste nothing when they hunt. Indians had their own game laws.

(I'm not writing out some things he said in English.)

When I'm with white people I don't mind, I try to understand them. I don't know any tales. I use to hear it but I can't tell it just like it was told. I use to hear about witchcraft and I think there is till some now. I think it's something like psychology. It mentions in the Bible. But it's a sin to witchcraft. To witchcraft someone, cause of envy, I think it's sin. Indians use to say, look at that woman with those red eyes. I'd be afraid to see one. I know it's not right. I never was taught to witchcraft. It's something like a spirit. I always say love has no boundary. Love had a lot to do with mind. For instance, my wife used to almost read my mind. I don't have anything against Indian doctoring because it was a gift to Indians as well as anyone else. I use to hear about Indians use to make themselves to dogs. One man told me dogs were after something so I got a club and went to see what it was and it was another, but when it looked up, it was the face of this man (old man) so I didn't hit him. I turned around and came home. Somehow, Indians had the corn. They made sofky, abuskee and other things. There is difference in corn. They don't hardly raise corn anymore. They buy them in stores now. Indians use to make home made hominy and sour bread. It's hard work to make "abuskee", but it's real good. Hard work and hot too. We use to eat dried beef with onions and it was good. Our transportation was wagon and mules. We had covered wagon. We went long ways too. From Okfuskee to go near Eufaula for Convention and Association. Some people had model T them days. I use to ride a little black horse to store and back. We weren't in a hurry in those days, like we are now. Everything is fast
