

(And, I guess, it'll get -- of course, Rogers, anymore, takes to handle a lot of business to make anything. Where was old Alluwe from here?)

Well, it was one mile east and three miles north of the county line.

And Nowata-Rogers county line is mile north (not clear) Nowata county.

(Nothing left there anymore.)

(Well, now, was it -- did it get covered up in the lake?)

Yeah, the Government took the lake yeah. Of course, they moved Alluwe.

But Alluwe, when I was a kid, old Alluwe was a going little town. It had oil fields and they had drug store, bank, four or five grocery, and dry good stores. They just -- it was down pretty low when the Government took the town. Small towns are having a time to survive.

(They surely have.)

You take Chelsea over here, they're just holding on. Nowata same way, Tolala, Oolagah -- well, Oolagah there on account of public service now maybe they can hold on for a while.

(That'll save them for a while.)

But little small towns are -- just have little time left. We think about back here in Model T days, Tulsa was long ways off. Heck, now, you could be down there thirty--forty minutes.

(That's right, it don't take long to get down there.)

Claremore, I was down there this morning. It used to be quite a little trip. My dad was on the school board back years ago, and he'd have to go Claremore once in a while. We thought that was big days -- well, it took him all day to go down there and back. And I was down there this morning, and, well, you can go down there in about twenty-five minutes, attend your business and be back here before they miss you. (Laughter.)
