

dance four times and go this way and come in four times. ((Indicates that the line dances east to west four times and then north to south four times)) So when they come down this way, the one that running it he comes in and gives them water to drink. He don't want them to be too fast. They put cedar on the fire...cedar and they make them inhale the cedar. So they take them out and they go out this way.(?) When they go out of that arbor they go so far and then dance back and forth....back and forth like that. And when they get through, that's the end of it. They would go down to the riveranywhere....and take a bath. And that means...the meaning of that is this boy ah...is going to live a long time. You know, he sacrificed himself to do without water and food for four days. And thats the way they got that fixed, you know. And then this boy that done it, dance with them all that four nights without eating or drinking water, he's going to live a long time. That's why they have that dance for them. And after they get through... blankets and goods and buggies...everything, you know, just like they give-away here. And they stack it up front of that arbor, and they don't say, "You come and get this." Everybody help themselves to it. This boys folks and this other boys folks and all four of them they belong to some family you know, and all these relatives comes with loads of things. And they pile them up and call everybody. They don't say, "You certain one." Don't say that. It's for everybody.. everybody that goes up there and pick those things and it's theirs. And that's the end of that Sun Dance.
