

the evil spirits away from you, all the sickness away from you. If the winds blowing this way, the smoke goes this way or that way or that way. Now this smoke is going to carry it long way from you or you or carry it away from them and they going to live a long life. That's what the cedar made for. That's what they use it like that. That's their medicine they use it. ((INTERRUPTION))

(Well, then could you tell that story about the bear?)

STORY ABOUT THE WOMAN WHO MARRIED THE BEAR

These four...five mans and four womens, they went to Old Mexico on horseback. They look for Mexicans and Navajo's...you know, those Indians. And they fight with them and they kill them and they take their horses away from them and give them down here...where they live. These four mens, they went that way. Then these three men got killed and this other one, this women belongs to one of those mans and that was his wife. The other man didn't killed. So him and this other women that belongs to this other man's wife, they started on foot. And in the morning they go because they say where the sun comes up...we live that way. So they just keep ah going---going, going. They walk, walk, walk, finally they walk at night time, in day time they hide. In the night they walk long many days and they just kept going, kept going. Finally this man got sick and he died. Well, that woman was left alone. She climbed a mountain and go in a cave and sleep. She would hear the coyotes hollering at her. She was really scared. She couldn't help herself. She was by herself. And she kept going and she wear mocassins out. She thought this man that died and she said, "I wished I had his mocassins, they could save my feet from cracking up and get sores." At night when it began to get cold, she thought of that. She went back to look for that man where he died. She couldn't find him. She couldn't find the body. She turned around and went again and she kept going, going, and finally
