

She went to Hammon to her uncle's. And sold a piece of land and bought a home over there. Well, when Tommy come back, well, he didn't care. He said, "That's all right. I tried hard to make a living for my wife, but she's not satisfied. I hope she finds somebody that will make a home for her." And then he write to her and tell her to file in divorce and she wouldn't do it. And she had two kids after she left him. She had a white little girl and then this little girl she's got. Just think, she went and named this little girl Howling Buffalo. Yeah. And she got in on his social security. But I won't say nothing. Because if I do say something against my daughter-in-law, I would be saying things against my grandchildren. She's got my grandchildren. And it's all right, whatever she does. Well, after my boy passed away, well, everything's all right with me.

(Is she a good mother to her kids?)

Oh, I guess she is--the oldest girl, she went and had a baby without a husband. And now the other one is running around. Now I don't know--she got hurt some way I think, over here. And this last time I went and seen my daughter, she was in there, and I asked her what she did and she said somebody bit her back and it got infected and she's still in the hospital. That's my granddaughter. I told her, "Well, I ain't got nothing so I have no right. Your mother is raising you. You are my grandchildren," I said, "But I feel like I ain't got no right to advise you kids. It's your mother's business to advise you. But one thing I'm going to tell you," I said, "You should have gone on to school." She didn't say nothing.

(This girl that these they wanted your boy to marry--was she their relative?)

Which one?
