

and my uncle was an Indian. She said, "Well, if you don't have 10 dollars to put down, when you get here just forget about coming."

(Which hospital was this?)

Well, it was in the country. I felt, that made me feel bad (when somebody's sick in the family they should see them).

Back to what I said awhile ago about the people not understanding some of the Indians or about the old people, some people I think, I don't know will get, they think that their only way of doing things is the right way or the only way of doing things. And there are, I think a lot of the Indians I know are very talented in different things like they, some can paint and some carve, but they never bring this out in the open. I think that's their own way of showing what they can do. Other people that see this, don't understand it. They think, "Oh, yeah, that's kid's stuff," or little things but I think that our culture should be preserved.

TALKS ABOUT BROTHER AND SISTERS

(About the brothers and sisters, have they all graduated? Are they going to school and what are their plans when they finish school or college and so forth?)

Well, my brother next to me is going to Northeastern State College. Well, he's a Junior, I think. He plans to be a coach. My sister, Sandy, is graduated from the Institute of American Indian Art. She has won quite a few honors in art, and she is a freshman at Northeastern. My brother, Timmy, has been graduated from high school this year, and, I think, he plans to go to Northeastern. He thought about going to Seminole Junior College first, and, then, to on to Oklahoma State; but, I think, he is going Northeastern for the first-two years now. I have a sister that graduated from Oklahoma State in 1965; and a sister that's been taking a few hours at a time at Ada, and she finished her sophomore year at University of California at Santa Barbara. I have a brother that will be a junior in high school and a sister who will be in the fourth grade. Something I'd like to say about her. When she was 3 years, I thought she had, well she was more mature than a lot of the children because
