

killed that Old Man Inkinish.

(Who was Old Man Inkinish?)

He was one of the tribesman.

(He was a Caddo?)

Yes, he was a Caddo.

(How did he get killed by them?)

Well, he was mistaken for his son. See, his son was their law enforcement officer. Henry Inkinish was. And then when they--there was a little store on the other side of (unintelligible) Creek, somewhere around there. They came in, these Dalton brothers as they called them, they were renegades and outlaws, they came in and I forgot who the--well, I don't recall at the present time, but anyway it was a White man that running the store and he came in because it was more of a trading post at the time, so he came in and said, "How are you Inkinish and so on." And then that's what they wanted. So they took him and tortured him. They killed him in fact by dragging him. Because I often heard because it was my father and my uncle that found the body after. They went after them. They volunteered to go after them, several of the early marshalls as they called them at that time; that was the law enforcement. They went after them.

(Where did this happen at?)

Right west of here and he was killed at Deer Creek, somewhere around there. They had him, I guess the two outlaws. My dad said when we got there, we trailed them, he said first. They took him and tied him up to his saddle and then they let his horse and then got so far and then they--and when they found out that the volunteers were right behind them, why then they took a rope and they tied his neck. Tied a rope around his neck and feet and that's the way they found him.

They dragged him a long ways before they ever--My dad said, "When I found him," he said, "He had his head in a creek, right at that deer
