

at the time. But anyway, this lady went and took that cradle. You know how the Indians will (sings softly), you know, putting the baby to sleep, the Indians did. She sang that all the time, went to other side, went clear around. Everybody laughed, you know. Putting everybody to, even the horses snoring, even the dogs were snoring, you know, put everybody to sleep. (Laughter) That's the power that's given to her, see. Course it didn't hurt anybody, just put everybody to sleep and she went inside and went to this man and tapped him real softly and set him down. And she says, "Sit here" She says, "Don't don't try to do anything. Just sit here." And these two men, they're asleep. She says, "They're not going wake. So, she went and brought him two horses, even Indians, you know, like old saying in television, where Indians riding horses without saddles, you know. Well, they had them back there. Way back there, my father used to tell us about those things when they had, make their own saddles, you know. They knew how to fix them, you know, these saddles. And so, it happened that she helped him on one of the horses, you know, tied him to the saddle. Tied him so he won't, you know, he was, been there, maybe, oh, about a day sitting around that's some, that fire, you know, and just worn out, exhausted, he was weak. She put on the horse and tied him to the saddle, and she got on the other horse. And when it took, and they chopped one of them guardman's head off, you know. And they took it and tied the, it happened that there was a mule following them. It was a pack mule. See, just like I was telling about these horses they have. Those people, they train to follow a horse. So, it had to be a mule. So they made that mule carry that head, you know. And then, and when they got so far toward morning about sunup, they heard a thundering sound back there. Look like a hundred thousand horsemen went
