

the way the story goes. He untied that bundle. Here this bundle was a sacred bundle. You know, those things, nobody dare to touch it, afraid of it, you know. Brings curse upon himself, you know. But he got up and untied it, took it down, sit down and he untied the little ones, you know. He took them out, put this one there and there and there. And he was going through them. Says, "This is for this, and this is for this, this is for this, this is this, this is for that, and that and this." And the owner didn't know half of those things, what they were for. Now, he's learning from this, what you call it? Sleepwalker. And he watching and he slept, just like he was instructing this man what it's all about. And half of the things, this owner didn't know anything about, but he learned that night what it's all about, "This medicine for this, and this medicine for that, this one is for this, and this is for that." And he did this exactly, the word that he knew, he says, he just hit him on the name, everything just correct. Everything, see, and put them together and just fix it and put it all by just the way it was, just the way it was tied. And put it back up and just the way it was tied up to the tipi corner, put it back up. Nothing happened to him, no curse or nothing, but he knew. And when he woke up and said, "What did I do? What Happened?" See, he didn't know nothing. He didn't know nothing about those fire what was in there. Yes, that's that, true story. And another time, the same person, they lost track of him. That night, I guess, everybody went to sleep, forgot him. And he went out, and then, it was time that must have been toward spring when the Missouri River was thawing, you know. And when it thaws, there used to be holes about that big, sometimes bigger here and there, you know. Seem like, it's funny the way it thaws, that Missouri River. That's the way it was, you know, holes here and there.
