

horse fell. Fell on him. And crushed his body and the bones and he was unconscious. And they carried him over in the tipi and his father tied a horse right in front of the tipi and called all the Buffalo Medicine Men to the tipi to doctor his boy. And there was about four or five in there. Four or five Buffalo Medicine Men. I was Indian Police at that time. So just for curiosity--I never did see them--I went inside. Just for curiosity. And they all sang the Buffalo songs. And all of them were singing and all of them had buffalo tails, shaking them, and feathers, and going through the ceremony. And that boy was laying up there and just boiling. Just like boiling--and the blood was coming out. Anyway, they work on him all afternoon, and in the evening that blood come out and he came conscious and he got all right again, and he lived to get married. His name was Hart Dani. D-A-N-I. And another time I saw them work was about 1914 at my uncle's house--Sam Ahtone, here in Carnegie. My cousin had been shot with a gun right over his shoulder here. Right about the shoulder, right above the heart. And there was about three or four of the Buffalo Medicine Men doctoring him. And I went in. They had a tipi up right in front of the house. Inside was Big Tree and his wife and other relatives. I just came in. And I heard them singing in there and they said they were doctoring. Doctoring my cousin in there. So I went in. They let me sit down. He was laying on the northwest side, on a pallet right on the ground. The medicine men were--two of them over there (at patient's head), or three, and two over here at the foot. And I was over here on this south side watching. And they were singing Buffalo Songs and shaking those buffalo tails, going through the ceremony, and he way laying down like that. And they were trying to make him get up. And he'd shake his head. He'd act like a buffalo--shake his head like that and he use his arm--just like a buffalo was pawing. He was unconscious. They'd sing...and he'd shake his head and he use his hand like he's just-- When he use his hand, two of them got up close and they shook those tails over him and he almost get up. He tries
