

color, so the fruit arrangements would look pretty.

The siblings of Warren Sankey, Sr. that came to Wyoming to help out were Floyd Sankey, Alonzo Sankey, Leota Sankey Clifford, and Willima Sankey. Other members of their respective families--husbands, wives, children, and some affinal relatives were also present. The Sankeys had three very large wall tents pitched close together on the north edge of the dance ground. They had built a huge cooking and work arbor in front of the tents, extending across all the tent fronts. This arbor was made of a framework of pine posts and 2x4 boards with the roof and sides covered with canvas. There were three Coleman stoves used for cooking, two of them equipped with small butane tanks. Two of the stoves were three-burner stoves. When I visited the camp on Sunday morning everyone was working hurriedly to get the food ready. The women had been up since before sunrise cooking. Warren Sankey, Sr. was sitting in the middle of the arbor personally directing the cooking operations while preparing the sage which would be taken into the lodge. He was sorting through a quantity of sage, trimming some of the stems and setting them all in a bundle. Meanwhile chicken was frying, potatoes were boiling, and eggs were being hard-boiled. I was put to work peeling onions and chopping pickles for the potato salad. When the eggs were done I started to peel them, but they were all bad. As soon as this was called to Warren's attention he ordered us to throw out all these eggs and start another dozen boiling. Olive Sankey said the eggs had been brought from Oklahoma and had probably gotten too hot somewhere along the way. Willima was arranging fruit and fussing over this. Coffee was simmering on one of the stoves. Warren kept an eye on this and after a time told someone to take it off because he thought it was done. Marcel Sankey, Warren's youngest son, a boy of about 11 years, hovered about the arbor, dividing his time between feeding and playing with a Siamese cat tied to the corner of the arbor and offering unsolicited comments on the progress of the cooking. He was sent on some errands and helped out in
