

That's right. On the number one post, see, right here. And this is number six, here (on the north side). The doorway is pretty wide.

(These leaders on horseback would enter through this doorway?)

Right, and go on inside of the lodge. And he'll come over here to about right here. And the other group will come in here and go in this lodge, and the other horseback riders here--two horseback riders are here. Then the last horseback riders is one here and one there.

(So they're closer to the outside of the lodge--)

Well, they're closer together here. Then they would be more closer together here, because all the fellow members, two different clans, are in here. They've got their full capacity here. And these other two clans, they also fill this whole room up.

(So you have two clans here and then two here, and your horseback people here.)

Yeah, right there. And they are the leaders of each clan.

(Pause) And that dance that they put on, they dance as war dancers, or they wear war bonnets and moccasins--leggings, and all that, just like they would in any other dance. But they have their own songs that they initiate this lodge--they show their effort, that they've done that work. And after they all done that, they are given a part of initiating (dedicating) the lodge to the sponsor of that ceremony (the pledger of the Sun Dance). Right after the sundown--or before sundown--that's when that takes place. And right after sundown they're supposed to be out of there--all the clans are. They dance so many songs. Of course, after they start dancing, they just dance up and down like this--like them Blackfeet (Apache Blackfeet dancers). That's the way they dance. They just go up and dance like that. And them guys will stand there--will remain on the horse and after the second song is sung, they'll leave their mount. They lead their horse out. That guy to the furthest side will come out and this guy on the south side will be the last one to come out. But the dancers will remain standing there. After the second song is sung, they bring the horses