

quail over there. You look like him." He push his head. "Leave me alone," he said. "I don't bother you." He said, "Leave me alone. I don't scare people." And then this bird flew again. And when that bird flew he looked--he flew back. When he gets there and then when he goes on, well, this quail saw where this Coyote (was). And then finally he scares himself. When he sees high weeds, oh, he jump. "He's going to scare me!" He jump. Well, I guess he just--this bird, quail, got tired. Just keep doing that. He sits in front of him, where he's going. He knows where he's going, and he flew over there. And he trots so much, he's sure running. His tongue's sticking out. And then he just kinda drag his legs, his tail. And then he looks back. And he scare himself: "Hey, hey!" He just talk, you know. And then finally that quail, you know, he find a big cliff, way down there. He just keep doing that, bothering this little quail, you know. And he just sing--I don't know what kind of song he's singing. Finally he just scare himself. When he see high weeds he just, "Hey--he's going to scare me!" He jump. And they just keep going. And then finally that bird be on his way again. "Ah, you the bird that over there I seen? Oh, there's lots of you--just alike!" he said. That's that same quail, you know. Then he said, "Don't bother me! You sure like to bother!" he said. "You go on your way! Don't bother me!" he said. "Well, I'm hunting, myself," he said. "Trying to get something to eat," he said. Well, he just went on again and they came to a big cliff. The road was just about at the edge of the cliff like that. Oh, he was running, singing, you know. He just hum, you know--go like that. And this bird sit down in the middle of that cliff, kinda--he kinda of see where the cliff--the road was like that. And he laid right here, that bird. He hide in that weeds. "Now I'm going to fix him." He sat there. And then by that time he (Coyote) forgot to scare himself. He forgot, you know, to scare himself. He forgot all about it. By that time that bird, you know--this quail--went "Brrrrrrrr--!" like that (imitating sound of quail taking flight). Oh, he went and fall in that cliff! And then this quail walk up to
