

darker shades of different dyes that they had for that in the early days when they used their own material.

(Did you say once (at a dance) that you weren't supposed to use yellow?)

It could be. It's not a dominating color, so far but it could be used as a trim. Maybe just as a center. Like if you had bead embroidery the center could be yellow as a natural color, but it's never a dominant in color like the others. We just have one woman that I know of, and she was Mrs. Caddo Dick. She loved yellow and she was the only woman that I ever saw to ~~ever~~ wear...but grandma said she had a reason. That comes from the ghost dance. That was the early doctoring from the Arapahoe. She said she was always like a flower outside of the other. She wore it with trim in the back, black or some other color, green, but she always wore yellow.

(Do those colors have any special meaning? For example, do certain colors stand for something?)

Well, they used to.

(Do I understand right that today the colors don't mean anything?)

Yeah, they don't mean anything special now. They used to.

(There was another question about some of the dancers had mirrors on their..)

On their headress?

(Yeah.)

That's the way they always fix them. That's the old style.

(That's the old style?)

Uhuh.

(What about the days before they had these kind of mirrors made out of glass?)

Well, they were made with shells and different things. Ornaments of some
