

No, my oldest daughters husband, at the beginning of the Second World War, the second year I guess, of it. He was drafted and went off to it's southern camp, oh, it's army camp in California. It's close to San Alemeneto, down in there so they somewhere -- anyway, my daughter was there and she couldn't stand it to be by herself and after this younger girl graduated, she wanted this younger girl to go out there and stay with her, so I let her go. And she was only 16 when she finished her high school. And she got out there and she wanted to go to work. And Fan said well I don't mind staying home in the daytime so bad, but I don't want to stay home at night. And well, just a couple of blocks from where they live the FBI station and they put up a sign for stenographers, office girls and she said, well I don't see why I don't go and take it, so she went and put her application in. And they said well, child, you ought to be in school, you got know business being out here. And they wanted to know where her mother was and she told them all about it, and that her sister was there and she come to stay with her and she wanted to work. And they said, well, you got to finish your high school, and she said, well I have and they wouldn't believe it, but they let her go to work. They said well let you go to work, just on trial and said you can--said we write back and get your mother's certificate and your superintendent's certificate. Have him sign it and send us your records, you know, so they did and after that then they said well, we'll give you a test. They just still didn't believe that she could do the work. And they said she made better than a 100% see. She didn't miss a question. And there was a lot of these big dignataries and officers and the like in there. They just had a fit about her. They called her the genius and everything when they saw her records and her school--the test they had given her. So she worked there until--oh, about a year I guess. Her husband--her brother-in-law, I'll call him Speck, it's Speck and Fan is the oldest one. And Oldine is my little girl, until he was sent across and he had to go to, well, it was up near Watsonville, Californai. He was sent to a camp up there in Watsonville. They later after that Second World War, that was disbanded and they give it to a church. I believe it was a Presbyterian Church and they made a college out of it. And then the girls--but before Speck went and took the oath to go across why he brought the girls
