

groceries there and then across the street was the meat market. The name of it was Henry Spanes Meat Market. We'd go there and we'd buy our beef all on credit till the first of the month. We'd buy credit and then we'd just fill up this taxi, we called jitney then. We'd fill it up and we'd come home and then a lot of groceries and first of the month we'd go pay our bills. Pay our debts. So when I started school at Ft. Sill my grandmother and my little brother were there. And after awhile he started school and then that was when my grandmother passed away. And when I was going to Ft. Sill--before I went there we used to visit them, you know my aunt used to go to school there. Two of my aunts, Maggie and Mabel. And my grandmother would take me over there to see them, you know, to the school. And in the back campus, there was a lot of tents, you know, little toy tents, just covering the whole back campus and I'd play there. Stay there to close to sundown. Then we'd go home. And they had rag dolls and everything there to play with. Oh, that was the most beautiful sight you ever saw, you know, little white tents just all covering the back campus. We'd play there and them girls that make their own tents and everything. I'd play there and then at sundown I'd go home. When I started school they didn't have them tents, just a few you know. But before my time they was a lot of them, and when we went to school, well, my brother after awhile, I was about in third or fourth grade I guess, well, he started school, and we used to go eat at the dining hall, he'd cry. He'd say, "Come on, come on." I'd look the other way and cry loud in the dining hall, they tell me go take him home up to the girl's building and play with him to sundown. So he'd go with me and he'd play till sundown. At sundown he'd be waling slow toward the boy's building. He'd finally go and it was that way. We had to all drill and everything you know. We had to march to the dining hall, school building, and we have to all march. At the end of our school, that's in
