

good. You know, there's lots of ways.

(I wanta hear some more about the corn.)

Umhummm.

(Now this red corn here, do you use it any other way, except for eating it fresh and making that corn bread?)

Well, you can eat it fresh too you know. You dry this too. You dry that corn and when you keep it like that, that's when you pound it. Mostly you pound this corn on that. And unless you have lots of it, you know, then, you can dry some.

(Well when you dry it like that, do you just let it get dry while it's on the corn stalk or what?)

Just let it stay on the corn stalk and then you pick them afterwards when you let it dry out there. And you let it get good and ripe, and then you pick the corn and put it away.

(Do you take it off the cob?)

Umhummm. Put it in sack and put away.

(How do you take it off the cob? Do you use anything for that?)

No, I just--I always just get the corn out of there, that's all.

(You use your hands?)

Umhummm. I use my hands. And we use to raise lotta beans. We raised this butter-beans, what I was tell'in you about over there, and we have beans all year 'round, whenever we raise beans. But, now looks like we lazy.

(Oh, I don't think you're lazy...out there chopp'in' corn! Well, did you ever use this red corn for making hominy?)

No, you could. Some people use it when they don't have no other corn, so they make it out of that.
