

So they got out and they left from there. And they went out and they went to different places, here and there. And they found things that they want. They got them. They said, "Well, we been here around this part of the country long time." He said, "We'd better go." They've been gone for long time. So they went on back. They started back and when they went on back, they went on, went on, went on, went on. They went day by day, night by night. They just went on. Finally they come the their own home, where they was originally, wherever they stayed. They got over there. Some people was surprised that they been gone so long, you know. And they wondered what happen, you know. Thought they might got killed up there by another tribe of Indians or some other people they might run into. They thought they got killed. That's why they didn't want - uh - they didn't show up so early. Like they always, but they stayed there for many months away from home, from their tribes and when they got over there to that place where they got from. You see, those people they moved to another place. They came over there where they did stay, all their belongings were taken by some of their folks with them, over to that place. So they got over there, nobody there and they went on search around, looked around. But they know just about where, about where, that uh - Kiowa's move from place to place. Finally they found it. They got over there. When they got to that place, their teepee and their belongins were already fixed up. Their friends of theirs fixed them up, had them ready, you know, had it ready. So they found them. They weren't hurt no way. They didn't get into no battle. They didn't get into no trouble. What they went after, they got the things that they want and then they went on their honeymoon over there. Down, way out in there. So that's the end of her true story. And that's a true story. That's what happened way back. (Sentence not clear)
