

get used to drinking that water in their stomachs because they don't have no water for four days; no food. So, right after they get a little strength in there about a day, well, after that day, they bring their food. The food comes in. It would be water the second one would be corn. Corn, that's what they take in there, corn, kernel corn. And the third one would be fruit, a wild-tree fruit. Whatever it might be, like choo-choo berries or something like that - some kind of a fruit they take in there, that be the third one. Then you see, the fourth one will be meat. It will be pound - - just find you know, it will be pound meat. And then the fifth one they take in there would be bread that's made of what they call this - - oh, I can't think of that - - grape nut, it's in packages you know. Well, that's the kind of a bread they use after they get that. And you know where that bread come from, the one I'm telling you? It come from way back in old Mexico. They go up there and they rob a home or they kill people out and they take their belongings over there. And then they'll steal horses and then they'll come back and bring it to their reservation, wherever they're at, wherever they live, they take it over there. And that's the way they have those food. And some of those Mexicans, they got friendly with those Indians, for they give them a lot of things, like a lot of food and a lot of different things. And that's what they had. The first bread they had was that grape nut. That's what they had but they had that kernel. They had that kernel and big rocks, you know. And they got it made hollow in there - round. And they got big rocks that's made like a big candle-like and they put that stuff in there and they go to pounding it till it get real fine, just like flour, like we got now. Well, they take that and they bake it, put water in there and they bake it. And then they got a fire made. They'd fix a hole and they'd build a fire there. And then they got sticks and that bend up like that. And they got some kind of sticks that go on top that don't