

where they come from They take it back over there. So, later, many years, then finally, they said a white man came into this country. When he came into this country, well, they had big wars. Wars among the whites and the Spaniards and the Indians. All having war with one another. And the Whites and the Spanish, they all fighting together. So, he said that one year, after, it was way years after that, well, they went ahead and they-- after they had these wars, well, then you see the United States whipped the Kiowas and Kiowa-Apaches and they make them trying to get them civilized. They trying to learn them a good way, good way of life. The way they been living wasn't no good. So they talk to them. So finally, they got together and then the United States army went over there and drove them north of Colorado, right north edge of Colorado. They moved them over there and they had their reservation there. So, finally later on, the President of the United States sent troops down there to move them Kiowas and Kiowa-Apaches to Kansas. So they drove them on back down here and they run them down into Kansas. Right on edge of Kansas-Oklahoma line. Back up in there. So, they drive them there, and they lived there for many years. Lived there for many years and they were increasing. Instead of decreasing, they were increasing, Kiowas and Kiowa-Apaches. So, finally the United States President again give them orders to move them here. At that time, they didn't know it was Oklahoma. So, they move them here. For so many years they were still fighting among the tribes. They were still fighting. So, after the army captured them, took away all their rights, take them away from them. Well, then they drove them back. When they drove them here and later they found out that this here was going to be Caddo County, Comanche County, and Kiowa County. And that's the way it came out in later years. But they were still in a battle yet. They were still fighting. When they got over here, my father's grandfather, he was a guest chief of the Kiowa-Apaches.

(What was his name?)