

give.

(What kind of things you give?)

They show them what they got then they way back there we used to be, Kiowa and Comanches used to have a lot of horses and cows. And they always give horses away. You know just raise them. Yeah even at dance there's a horse out there with blankets out there, standing out there what they're going to give away. Yeah boy, they used to have lot of horses, that's how they used to travel to with horses and wagons. In them days that's all they used to have. But you see the way they are now we ain't got nothing but scooter cars.

(Give away a bicycle instead of a horse. All the horses they had even up to a short time ago all mainly horses that they sold or raised?)

Yeah. They raised them, cows whatever they got. Still right now some of them I noticed this old man, he's my baby girl's grandpa's brother. His name is Joe Coffey. He still got cows. Just like for instance his granddaughter, his boy's daughter is going to be a princess to Indian Exposition. When, whenever they were collecting the princess why she had a more vote, she won the princess. He give a cow to them Cheyennes over there. Just like that and then they give a cow to, oh, they give away cows yet.

CLOSENESS OF COMANCHE AND ARAPAHO

(Something else I was curious about, I was talking to an Arapaho man, name of Jess Rowledge the other day at the fair.)

Yeah, uh-huh.

(And he was saying about how the Arapaho and the Comanche are close together.)

Yeah.

(How come, I didn't understand, I don't know if he told me or I didn't understand. I ask him how come the Arapaho, Comanche are close whereas they're not close as the Cheyenne and Comanche or as close. How did they get together to be close like that?)
