

north. Heading either towards north of Geary or east of Greenfield. (Alfred says "Grandfield," but he surely means Greenfield, located north of Geary in Blaine County on the North Canadian River.--jj) Somewhere between west of Calumet. It's just across the river. I think it's the North Canadian. It's either on the north side or south side. So they got two or three places where they have the Sun Dance. Most of the time it's around there by Greenfield. It's north of Geary. It's kinda east of Greenfield about four or five miles north--northeast--right by the river--that North Canadian River. There's a trail there straight north of Fort Cobb, towards Bridgeport. (Bridgeport, now practically defunct, was located in northernmost Caddo County on South Canadian River.--jj) Pert' near all them creeks--there's crossings. No bridges. Pert' near all them creeks you have to go down--it's kind of a dip--

(Was it hard to do?)

Well, I don't know--I don't know how the horses feel about it! They drag the wagons, you know. The boys, they kinda are in groups, you know. Sometimes way back there they're playing around. They get tired, and they catch up with the folks. Tie their horses on the wagons and get in wagon and either sleep or rest. And all them dogs, you know, they just run under the wagon. I don't know why they do that. Pretty near every dog. They don't try to get in with somebody else under somebody else's wagon. I guess dogs sensible, too. So get to around Bridgeport. They got a ferry over there. Yeah. They got--I don't know--I think it's cables. In them days, there was lots of water. And you can't drive across the river, because the river's too deep. So a ferry was used there. And of course, on the south side of the river there was Bridgeport. Most of these Indians get their supplies over there.

(Was there a store there?)

Yeah, there's stores there. They got store there. It's kinda like what you call these--trading posts. It's kinda like a trading post. It's in that one store everything in there, you know. Anything that you can use.

(Groceries?)

Groceries, hardware, meat market. Even got a post office in there.
