

they get them out of a big mountain. When they get down, they rocks. The flint rocks. It's not just a common sand rock or just a red rock. They find the best flint rock they could find to make them. Make the spears they put on the end of the arrows. They hewed them down with some other rocks they get and they make those something like a tomahawk, like a hatchet. They take that and they work that down where they go and work this little flint rocks to put in the end of the--and they make them long and they make them a little wide to put it into the wood, and wet the sinew and they put that and tie that in there with the sinew. They take and wet the sinew and they put that in there, all around there when whenever it gets dry it just as hard as a rock. You can't pull that flint out of there forever. You can't pull it out. You got to break it to get it out. That's the way they make that. When that sinews dry, well then that rock there will go and get solid just like a rock. Then these arrows, they make them so straight and they make them so smooth and these feathers up here and then when you shoot anything these feathers here make the arrow go straight. I won't turn. I don't care how high the wind is. That arrow will go right straight through. And they have these long spears--(interruption)--and they get to them places, then they go ahead and they have a big gathering, dancing you know, and a celebration. How much did they kill and what they conquer. You know, steal horses, capture young girls and young boys. And that's how they become a bribe of that tribe. Ones that captured. They raise them and then they get them up big, well they don't want to go back to their tribe they used to be captured. They become one of them tribes. That's the way it was way back there when the Indian people were fighting among themselves. They fought many battles, among the American soldiers, the French, also the Spaniards, and Mexico. Fought them many many wars with them. But the Kiowas were supposed to be the best warriors in the whole United States Indian tribes. Supposed to be the best warriors, bravest. In every way the Kiowa are mentioned to be the leader of everything, in dressing, in any performance that they do. The Kiowa
