

to be ruined. We'll fight for our country, for our flag. We believe in it."

They go. We got a lot of them go. First world war, second. We got a lot of our boys killed, a lot of them. I was in the first world war but I didn't go across to fight, but I was soldiering in the United States. I volunteered. I was just eighteen. Following that eighteen I was dishcharged. 1919 I was discharged that's when I got married, right after I got dishcharged. Well do you want to go ahead when I got married and get hers so we can get through with it. You got it on now?

(Yeah, it's going.)

Well, this is her story. That's Mary Tartsah brining out her story that was being brought out way back there, way I don't know how many centuries ago. This story was brought out--there was a camp at the foot of a big mountain. They were camped there. And these people here, these Indians said this, "Well --" the people said that there was people there among the Indians, this young girl, a young girl and they--this girl never did put her foot on the ground, on the dirt. They never put this girls foot on the dirt or any place on the ground. They always got something there to put--ordinarily she would sit on there. And whenever they wanted to move her, get her away from there, they would carry her and put her on another pallet or something. She never did put her foot on the ground. Said this girl has something that talk to him, talk to her. Said, "The minute that you put your foot on the ground, something was going to happen." So they never did put her foot on the ground. So while she was there they had her sitting up there and there was a little tree here was kind of small, but it straight. And got limb, few limbs on there. And they--I guess the parents they forgot about that little girl and this other neighborl girls these other Indian girls, they went over there and they pick her up. They pick her up and they took her to that tree what I'm telling you about. That tree that was standing there, you know. They set her down there and while they were playing around there this girl she looked up and there was a little bird sit up on there, on the tree. And she could just reach and catch it,
