

nobody's supposed to ride them. And they have horses that they use on the warpath. And they gonna have to be fast. They mostly use their race horses. They used to have a race horse they call "Gray Dick." He was (speaks Kiowa to Jenny). He was owned by Bob Koomsa. What was his name? (speaks to Jenny again) Tónkoy-- he was that Gray Dick, they call him. He was a fast horse. In 1900 he was that horse, I saw him. He run races among the good white thorough-bred horses. And 1908, '09, '12 in there, Well, I saw him run at Hobart in the fair. It was run just like the white people. That is way back there in the 1800's--way back there, in 1900 and 1891, somewhere in there, they used to have the horses. They don't have a circle like we do today. They just run from here to several miles. There was no fences and they just take off until they got round up. At Fort Sill, the government, well, they used to have race horses there but they have a straight track. They go out there some evening and they bet just like they do on--big money and saddle and race horses with each other. And they used to run race horses with the Mescalero Apaches--Geronimo. He had some race horses. Where he got them, I don't know. But they used to run race horses at Fort Sill in about 1901, somewhere--they used to run when Ft. Sill, that is 18th Cavalry joined and, of course, the white people come through running against government horses. Well, they picked it up and then they bought horses and they had race horses just like everybody else. But they didn't have no circle, just like Oklahoma City today, it's just a straight track. (Well, back a long time ago, did they used to use saddles when they had these horse races?)

They had no regular saddle. I know where there is one. It was
