

(How about the rainbow--would they ever talk like that to the rainbow?)

Well, things like the thunder--early in the spring when they hear a thunder or lightning, they thank the Big Man that they see another summer.

(When they pray like that, do they use this name, daúyáe'edal?)

No-- dómoiyom[^]dau.ki -- "the Man that made this earth". The Creator, I guess. Yeah, that's the way they used to pray--the Creator. "Man that made this earth." Everything. Put everything here on this earth. -dau.ki that's "God". dómoiyom- that's "man that made this earth".

DREAMS

(Going back to the effects of the peyote--that it has on different people--do you ever tell other people how it has affected you during the meeting--or discuss that?)

No, they don't They don't talk about that. But sometimes some of them do. Well, a little later on, like if you see a vision in there--something--then later on they're going to say, "I seen this over there and it happened that way." Some of their family--if somebody get sick or something.

(Have you ever heard of something like this that you could tell me about?)

I don't know. Just like in a dream, you see maybe a creek or something--some place way off somewhere. Big river or creek or something, in the dream. And when you wake up a little later on so many years after that, you're going to see that place again. "Hey, this is the place I dreamed about one time." It's something like that vision. Yeah. I get that way in a dream. I dream and see a creek or someplace or little hills, like. Someday I'll be driving through there and, "Say, this is the place I dreamed about long time ago." Yeah, it's funny, those things. But a vision--well, if you eat too much of that, it'll just take you out. Just like this man said, "I've been doing all that--eating all that peyote,
