

...gonna search for my people." And he heard a song. "Always sing this when you're gonna begin eating this peyote. And middle of the night if you want water, you sing this song. Morning song, and especially if you're at home you call meeting together and tell your boys, your men, to come and pray. And in the morning when the woman comes in and brings the water, you sing this song for her. When you're gonna quit, sing this song." He learn all them four songs. He kept singing them, repeating them, repeating them, repeating them--this, the second and third--this Midnight Song, this Quitting Song--got them pretty well memorized. And finally he found his people. Oh--he had another dream. Got up on kind of a butte, like. He saw a wet place down one of them little buttes, you know--mesas--he went over there and there was water coming down there. And he wanted to see what was up there. It was evening. Up there was some rocks--boulders--not too high. Kind of like half--section-like--natural. He got up there and saw that little spring bubbling. And back of that some buffalo has seen him and went down this hill. There was a place looked like a crescent--a rock--projected out from the rest of this (unintelligible word) place where this water goes down. So he sat on the hide of that moon like that--that water going down. Pretty soon he went to sleep, so he just wrapped up his blankets. It was summertime and he just lay down and he dreamed about those songs. He said, "Maybe this is the place where the meeting should be--look like. This half-crescent, moon. And this water--there always be water there for the meeting--midnight and morning. So he got up and went over there and drank the water--got down on his knees and drank that water from the bubbling spring, washed his face and went back to bed. And in the morning the sun was coming up--just at dawn. Sat up there and looked at that water. It was still bubbling, going down. It had been running down for years, I guess. It just kinda wore out the rock down there. He looked at the size and he said, "Well, this be the
