

The community still numbers many Indian citizens in its population, although white people began coming into the community about the time of statehood, leasing and renting land from the Indians.

Soon after the Indian allotments were made, miners came into the community to mine coal, hauling it to Vinita with wagon and team, as most Vinita homes and business places were heated with coal at that time.