

Street yonder, on up that way. It goes right up through the middle of it. I've been there lots of times, before this was ever layed off in town.

(Well, the old cemetery site is till there ain't it?)

Yes, uh-huh. But you know it was the orphans that was buried there.

There was no tomb stone, just a little rock. The only tombstones there is is for a man and a woman that use to be the cooks there. Mr. and Mrs. Sturnes.

(Sturnes?)

Sturnes, and they got big tombstones over there and their daughter used to be in Pryor, and every spring she'd bring two men with her and come out here and set them tombstones up and clean that all off nice around there, and fill in them graves and round them up and (it wouldn't be a month till them tombstones would be knocked down. They soon be down.

--- I went over there here and awhile back, me and another woman, and she kept asking me about them tombstones and I said "Well we'll just go over there and see. They were down in them weeds." And we went over there and but them tombstones was all knocked over -- and we couldn't move 'em. So we didn't find out anything after we went. Did you know Mr. Kingfisher?

(Oh yeah.)

He passed away a few days ago.

(Now was that that Jim Kingfisher?)

He's--I think Skate was his brother. I believe it was, I'm not sure.

Jim passed away just a few days ago.

(And Sam Buckskin is he still...?)

I don't know Sam Buckskin.
